

Successful Police Exhibition for PDMS

PDMS have just returned from a successful exhibition at the NEC in Birmingham where they were participating in the International Police Conference and Exhibition, ACPO 2003. With an existing track record in the criminal justice sector, PDMS have identified a fit with their component based software and the demands of the police for flexible systems based on open data standards. To mark their arrival in the police IT market, PDMS were both exhibiting and speaking at ACPO. ACPO is the UK's largest police event and attracts attendees from police forces and the criminal justice sector in the UK and further afield.

The show provided PDMS with the opportunity to showcase their latest project, a crime, lost and found and property management system. This sophisticated web based system is currently undergoing testing by the West Midlands Police Authority and attracted a great deal of interest from show visitors.

PDMS also used the ACPO show to launch their new software development platform. Known as 'Foundations TM', it supports a component based approach to software development and implementation and is particularly suitable to browser based applications which are becoming more widely used by the police.

Giles Milner, Director, commented "This was the perfect event at which to promote our new software development platform, Foundations TM, which is particularly suited to the police market. It combines the benefits of a tried and tested product approach with the flexibility of bespoke development."
